The Jonesboro Historic District is located along sections of West Concord Street, Jones Street, South Anderson Street, Bay Street and Lytle Street. The district consists of forty-one buildings of of which thirty-seven, or ninety percent are contributing. The vacant lots in the district are considered contributing because they are a major element in the rural character that is one of the area's most distinctive features. Contributing properties in the district were constructed between ca. 1895 and ca. 1935 and represent the only intact historic black neighborhood in the city of Morganton. Most of the properties are small one-and-one-half story frame cottages, shotgun houses, and bungalows. The Philo Harbison House (#1), a two-story frame residence, is the most substantial property in the district and is associated with Philo Harbison, a builder and contractor. Very little modern construction has taken place in the district and that which has is of a similar size and scale to the historic properties. The area remains almost completely intact and presents a sharp visual contrast to the more formal white residential neighborhoods of the same era.

The boundaries of the Jonesboro Historic District were drawn to include as much of the historic Jonesboro neighborhood as remains intact and exclude surrounding modern or thematically unrelated construction. On the northeast the district is bounded by a large parcel of land associated with the Philo Harbison House (JBHD #1). The lot contains, in addition to the Harbison House, a small frame cottage and has a broad ravine running through the southern portion. West Concord Street bounds the district on the west. The eastern side of the street is lined with some of the more substantial bungalows and cottages in the district. The west side of the street is not included within the boundaries of the district, but is an important element in defining the character of the area because it is essentially undeveloped and shields the district from the more sophisticated residences on West Union Street. The southwest end of the district is defined by a narrow ravine with dense undergrowth and a scattering of trees that runs parallel to South Anderson. The southeastern boundary is irregular and was determined by modern construction, the Southern Railway line, and the historic boundaries of the Jonesboro neighborhood.

Jonesboro was known as such at least as early as 1898 and it is likely that the area was populated by blacks much earlier. Although the earliest extant houses were built or have integrity to ca. 1895, it is known that the Philo Harbison House was constructed in stages and that a number of the houses on W. Concord Street were substantially altered in the bungalow mode that now identifies them. Many of the houses on West Concord Street are associated with prominent citizens in the black community and large landowners in the Jonesboro neighborhood suggesting that West Concord was settled first. Later construction took place on Jones Street and South Anderson, both of which are narrow, winding streets that suggest their beginnings as paths between the houses.

Jonesboro's unique (in the context of Morganton) rural feeling is characterized by several of the same elements that define the boundaries. The ravine on the Philo Harbison property is perhaps the most striking feature of the district. The property falls away from West Concord Street at a gentle slope and is completely undeveloped with a scattering of small

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Jonesboro Historic District is located along sections of West Concord Street, Jones Street, S. Anderson St., and Bay St. southeast of the Central Business District. The area has traditionally been a black residential beighborhood and remains so today. Morganton's only intact historic black community. Homes in the district were constructed between ca. 1895 and ca. 1935 and include examples of vernacular Victorian cottages, bungalows and shotgun houses. Perhaps the most distinctive feature of the Jonesboro Historic District is the lay of the land and its rural visual character. The district still contains large areas of open space, some of which is used for garden plots, and it is bounded by two ravines. The streets wind gently through the uneven terrain, giving the impression that the houses, in many cases, were there before the streets were laid out and the streets had to conform to the layout of the residences. Two of the houses are located in the ravines without visible roads leading to them. The far end of S. Anderson Street with its two shotgun houses is still dirt and belies its location so near the center of the city. The most substantial house in the district, the Philo Harbison House, is located far off the paved street on a large parcel of land. Even though modern construction has taken place in the Jonesboro neighborhood, the district's distinguishing features are still intact and do much to soften the effect of modern intrusions. Of the forty-one buildings in the district, thirty-seven (ninety percent) are contributing. The district is important for its association with prominent black citizens, most notably Philo Harbison, who was a contractor and builder. Harbison is known to have constructed his own two-story house and also several of the shotgun houses on Jones Street and South Anderson Street.

CRITERIA ASSESSMENT

A. The Jonesboro Historic District is significant in Black History as Morganton's oldest intact black neighborhood and possibly the only solely black residential area developed in Morganton as early as 1880. Since an important distinguishing characteristic of the neighborhood is its informal, rural appearance, vacant lots have been classified as one contributing site within the district.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Jonesboro Historic District is significant as Morganton's oldest and only remaining intact black neighborhood. Approximately forty small, one-story, mostly frame, residences dating from ca. 1890 to ca. 1935 make up the district. This area represents the major and perhaps the only solely black neighborhood in Morganton during this time. Jonesboro is also important for its association with prominent citizens in the black community, most notably Philo Harbison, a builder, contractor and businessman. The district retains most of the rural, less formal visual elements that have characterized it since its settlement and distinguish it from the white neighborhoods.

As early as 1880, census records show a large concentration of blacks that is believed to be the Jonesboro area because family names long associated with Jonesboro are included in the list. While the/is not clear, it was almost certainly derived from several people in the area with the first names Jones. Black residents Jones Avery and Jones Erwin and a white Jones Erwin who lived in the old Erwin House on West Union must certainly share credit for the name. The Jonesboro area was owned by a few large black property owners who sold off lots to friends and family. They included Jones Erwin, Jones Avery, Delia Scott, Henry Moore and Philo Harbison. Considering the number of families in the area named Erwin and the proximity of the Erwin House on West Union, it is likely that some of the residents of Jonesboro had been associated with the Erwin family as slaves. Former slaves residing near the homes of their former masters was a relatively common settlement pattern in the years just after the Civil War.

Most of the houses are very simple although several do exhibit influences of Victorian era styles. According to a long time resident, most of the houses remaining are the original ones that have been altered over the years. A number show the influence of the bungalow mode. Most of the houses in Jonesboro were owner built and occupied aside from the small shotgun form houses at the end of Jonesboro and Anderson Streets. These houses were built by Philo Harbison and rented to other black families.

Perhaps the most significant resident of the neighborhood was Philo Harbison. Harbison was born a slave in 1856, but resided in his master's house and was taught to read and write. As an adult, he trained as a master carpenter and ultimately became a contractor and builder. The only existing homes he is known to have built are his own home in the Jonesboro district and the houses he built as rental property.

It is known however, that he had a brisk business and constructed homes for whites as well as blacks. Harbison also owned what was for some time the only planing mill in Morganton. (See continuation sheet) trees, clumps of brush and a large garden plot. Just west of the ravine are two small frame houses accessible by a narrow, unpaved stretch of Bay Street. The unpaved road and the placement of the houses beside the ravine suggest a rural setting in which residences are located far off the main road in the midst of farmland. There are sections of the district along West Concord, Jones and South Anderson Streets, that have relatively dense concentrations of residences. However, even these sections retain a rural feel because of the vernacular character of the small frame houses and because the ravines and unpaved roads can be seen from almost any vantage point in the district. In addition, Jones and South Anderson Streets are narrow, gently winding streets punctuated by large trees. Only sections of these streets have sidewalks which further enhances this character. South Anderson Street below Lytle Street is unpaved and curves into the ravine. Two small shotgun houses are located at the end of the unpaved portion and are visually isloated by the curve in the street and the dense growth of the ravine. Another residence is located in the ravine and appears to be completely inaccessible by car.

The Jonesboro neighborhood remains entirely black. Although the area is surrounded by more dense residential and commercial development, the district retains its rural character and does not seem to be in danger of development in spite of its large parcels of vacant land.

He also owned a store on Main Street which he rented to Peter Newton. This last acquisition caused a bit of a stir, needless to say. Harbison was very well-respected by the white community and according to city records, was frequently consulted by the city council on matters of importance to the black community. Harbison and his family were instrumental in forming the St. Stephen's mission of Grace Episcopal Church.

Other well-known residents of the area were Noah Fleming, who worked at one of the furniture factories and was also looked to by the white community for advice on black matters, Albert Lytle, a successful painter and wallpaperer, and Alfred Lynch, who owned a blacksmith shop. 109
